Formerly on well-kept plantations, as soon as practicable, the mothers were relieved of the care of their offspring, and the master had them properly attended to in regular "nurseries." In fact, to the slave-owner the actual profit came from the increase, and self-interest compelled a proper amount of attention. Now, however, this care is thrown. Now, however, this care is thrown upon the mother, and the testimony is unanimous that the present startling mortality among children is due to the persistent neglect of their mothers. There seems to be an absolute indifference—a want of maternal instinct. The result of such conduct—consecially where there is no proper medically where the properties of the properties instinct. The result of such conduct—especially where there is no proper medical attendance—may be readily imagined. Few physicians would serious ly think of setting down to the practice of their profession in the country at the South, especially under existing circumstances.
